

Mareike Seitz

become

Illustrated by Julia Schäfer

You're invited to be curious,
to look closely and to tell the story your way.

A story without words about a girl who tries in vain to share her colourful and rich inner life with the noisy and sometimes close-minded world that surrounds her. Yet somehow, she still finds her own positive way of communication.

At least, that's what I think. And you?

What is this story about?

A large, empty rectangular box with rounded corners, intended for writing the answer to the question above.

Which three positive words would you use to describe the girl?

A large, empty rectangular box with rounded corners, intended for writing the answer to the question above.

How does the girl feel when she talks to other people?

A large, empty rectangular box with rounded corners, intended for writing the answer to the question above.

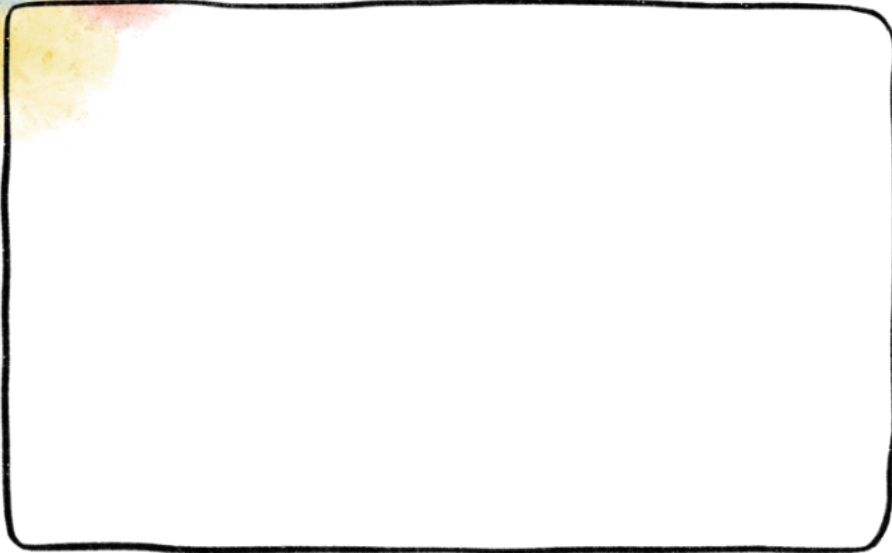

How do people respond to her?

A large, empty rectangular box with rounded corners, intended for writing the answer to the question above.

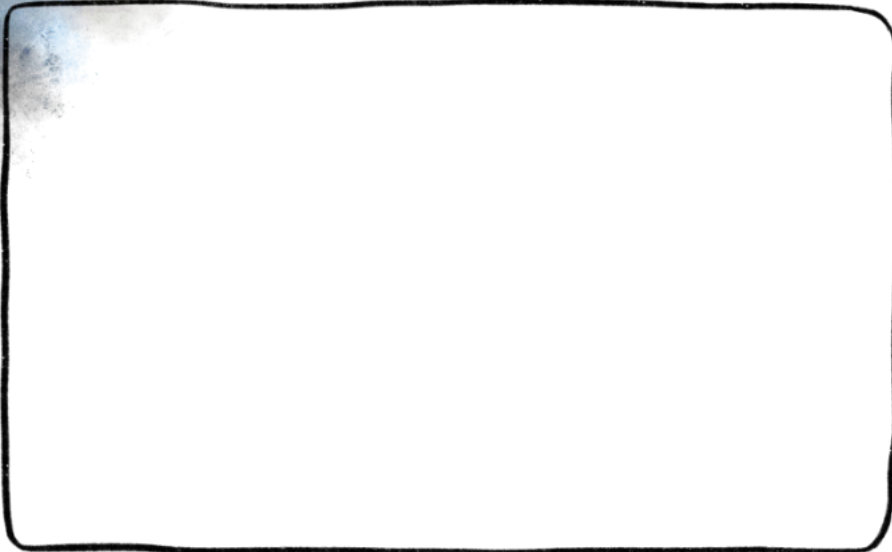

What is the difference between the girl and the people she meets?

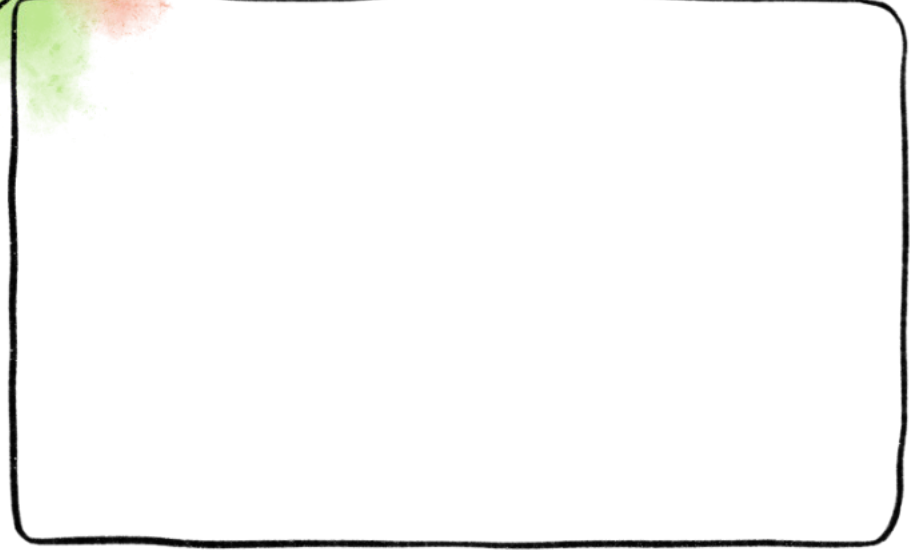

Where can she think best?

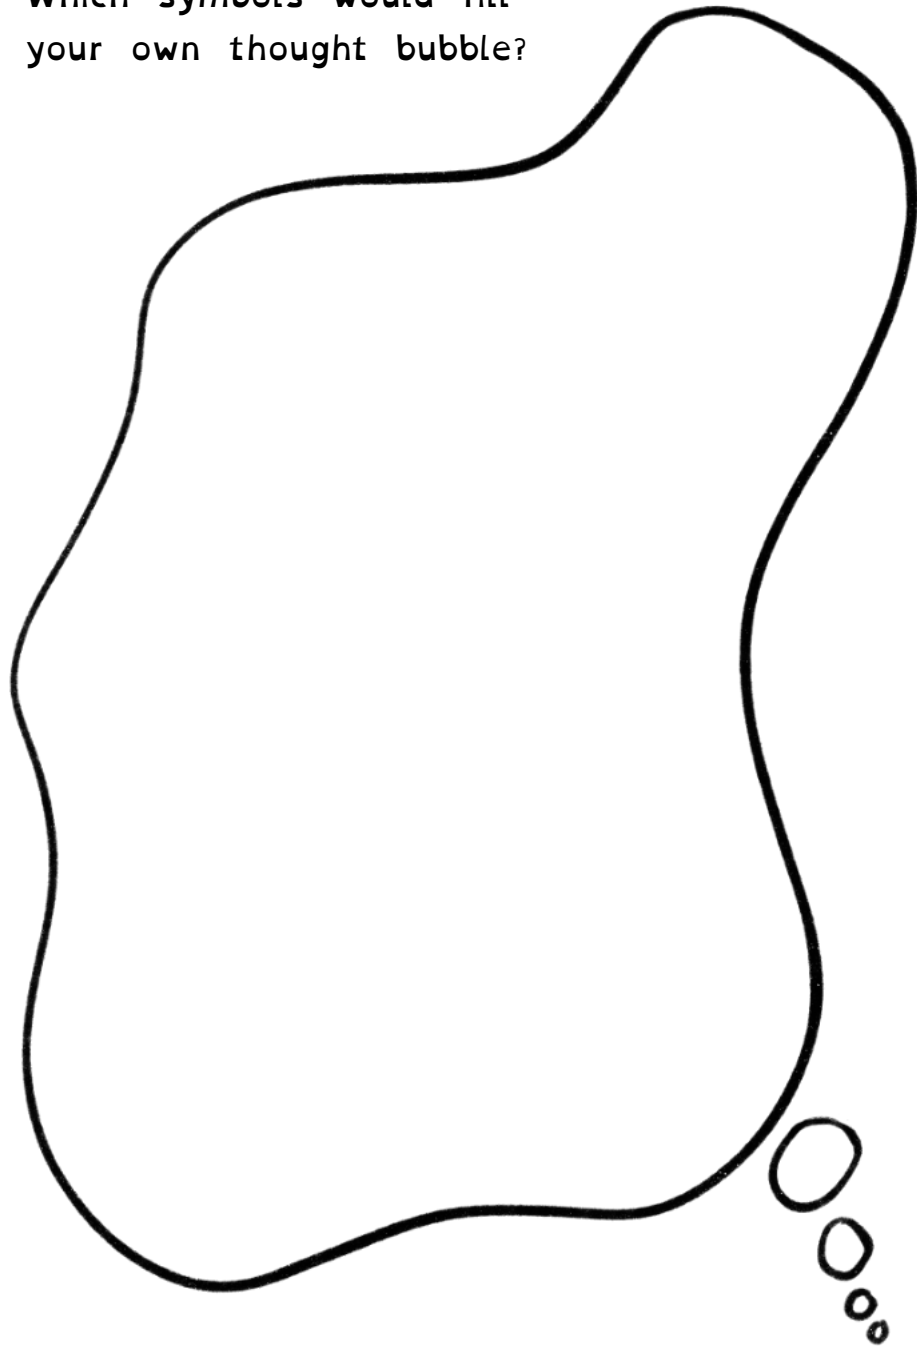

What does she do to get the grey out of her thought bubble?

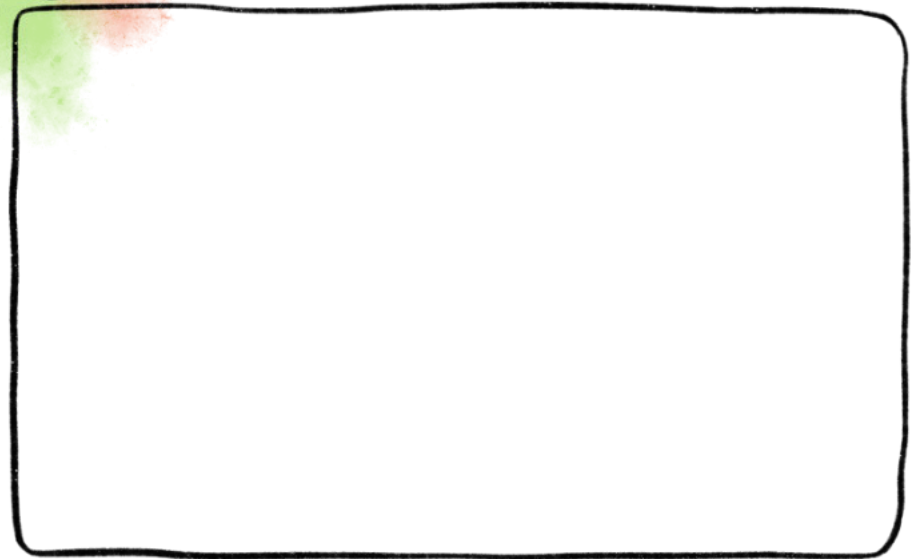

Why do some of the balloons fly away?

Which symbols would fill your own thought bubble?

What do those symbols stand for?

Which symbols would you like to add or erase in the future and why?

Which symbol did you notice the most and what do you associate with it?

A large, empty rounded rectangular box for writing an answer.

Can you describe a situation where you felt like the girl in the story?

A large, empty rounded rectangular box for writing an answer.

Name three positive words to describe yourself.

A large, empty rounded rectangular box for writing an answer.

What do you do to get 'the grey' out of your thoughts?

A large, empty rounded rectangular box for writing an answer.